Stages of Faith: The Psychology of Human Development and the Quest for Meaning # Publishers, kindly restore access to over 500,000 books! This is a significant milestone in the development of faith. It involves the formation of identity, self-actualization, and the integration of the unconscious with conscious processes. The stages of faith are characterized by increasing complexity and depth, allowing individuals to develop more sophisticated understanding of their place within the universe. There has been a long-standing view that transpersonal states represent abstract forms of social or emotional intelligence (Scheler, Mead). Some have proposed post-formal developmental status, while others argue for complementary views. The relationship between parents and children can significantly impact our understanding of God. Inequalities in societal power structures can distort our perception of the divine. Researchers have explored theoretical shortcomings in egalitarian theory by John Rawls, offering alternative perspectives on morally arbitrary contingencies. Paradoxical processes involving people and change are found in psychoanalysis, group analysis, and religion. The principle of asking the horse not the rider serves as a starting point for searching faith development. The play "Duet for One" illustrates how neo-Piagetian psychology and faith development can illuminate relationships between the psycho-social. People often place limitations on their religious thinking, restricting their ability to comprehend concepts, metaphors, and analogies. Research has proposed the term "religious development" (Goldman 1965) to describe women's ways of knowing and acting. This concept may have potent implications for transpersonal psychology. This chapter presents the case of Nina F., a young woman who experienced feelings of alienness as she moved intercontinentally with her family. These feelings can be a significant aspect of our understanding of faith development.
